

Where's Wally fun run!

On Sunday the 24th of March over 1200 people attended/took part in the Where's Wally fun run in London, Victoria park. For the national literacy trust "I run 10 k lasting 1 and a half hours and I would 100% do it again it was an amazing experience" said Miss Allen. Many people were cold and wet but was still in good sprits

Here is some information from the National Literacy Trust

Eight-year-old Mia lives on a tough estate. Her parents can't read or write so no-one has ever read her a bedtime story. There are no books at home, no bedtime stories and no trips to the library. Mia's brothers left school with poor literacy and have been unable to get jobs. Recently her eldest brother has been in prison. But Mia has become the first reader in her family. The National Literacy Trust has worked with her school, holding fun storytelling events and giving books of her own to keep for the first time. We have taken her on a visit to the library and she has become the proud owner of a library card. We will continue to support Mia and work with her secondary school to make sure she has the skills she needs to get a job. By taking part in the run you can help us raise £1m to work in the poorest communities and give thousands of children like Mia new opportunities.
